Dortmund is one of Germany's eclectic and dynamic 21st century cities, located in the North Rhine-Westphalia region of the country. Modern Dortmund is vibrant and dynamic, well-known for its excellent shopping, beer and football. But there is another, altogether softer, side to this former industrial powerhouse. Dortmund has great theatres and cultural centres, a range of fascinating museums and, with half the city given over to parks and gardens, enough green spaces to sooth the senses.

THE CITY

Tupungato/Shutterstock.com

In the 19th century Dortmund was a smoky, sweaty and extremely prosperous city. The industrial revolution brought mines, mills and manufacturing – and jobs by the thousands. Within a century, the population grew from a paltry 4,000 to a staggering 140,000, making Dortmund the largest city in the Ruhr region. The Second World War devastated much of the city – around 70 percent of the buildings were flattened – and the 1950's saw an intense period of rebuilding.

Much of what you see in Dortmund today was built in the last 50 years. The coking plants, mines and steel plants have gone or be turned into funky museums, while Dortmund's citizens work in the city's burgeoning I.T., insurance and services industries. Nor is leisure time neglected – Germans flock to Dortmund for the excellent shopping and the city has good restaurants, bars and theatres (cabaret being a particular speciality), including a superb purpose-built concert hall.

SHOPPING

Erich Ferdinand (image cropped)

Shopping is one of Dortmund's principal attractions, attracting consumers from all over the country. Much of the shopping is done in the very heart of the city. As many as 12,000 shoppers an hour pass through Westenhellweg and its continuation, Ostenhellweg, attracted as much by the huge range of shops as the highly-competitive prices. Department stores like Kaufhof, electronic retailers, chain stores, food stores, health and beauty stores: they're all here.

If you are looking for designer fashion and accessories head to Hansastrasse, where you'll find designer names such as Escada at no. 61, or head to more discrete Kleppingstrasse. Brückstrasse has a more youthful vibe and is the place to go for trend fashion, sports fashion and hair salons. Once scruffy and known for its fast-food joints, Brückstrasse today likes to think of itself as Dortmund's Carnaby Street. On neighbouring Kampstrasse you'll find the huge department store, Karstadt – which is a good place for the casual shopper, while the Esprit store is a few stores up at no 28.

ESSENTIAL INFORMATION

Dortmund Airport

Dortmund's airport is located 13 km east of the city at Flughafenring 11. There are regular bus services running between the airport and the city bus station (located opposite the main train station). The journey time is around 25 minutes. The first bus from Dortmund departs at 4.30am; the last bus departs at 10pm. A current bus timetable can be downloaded from the airport website. Look for 'airport express' (the airport shuttle refers to the connection with the local railway station).

An alternative, but slower, route is to take the city bus 440 at the airport and then change at Aplerbeck station for the U47 metro.

There is also a 5-minute bus shuttle service connecting the airport with the local railway station, Holzwickede. From here you can catch a regular train into Dortmund. Trains run approximately 8 every hour. The buses run at 15-20 minute intervals. Children under 6 travels free of charge.

Taxis take around 15 minutes for the journey to and back from the airport.

Public Transport

Dortmund has a transport system befitting a contemporary city: buses, streetcars/trams (the S-Bahn), the metro or city train (U) and the funky monorail, the H-Bahn, at the university. It is the company DSW21 who is primarily responsible for bus and rail service in Dortmund. You can buy your ticket at kiosks, shops, travel agencies and lottery outlets.

You can also get around easily by foot in heart of the city centre.
